A MERRY CHRISTMAS.—How will you have a "Merry Christmas?" We know of but just one way to find the greatest enjoyment in such a holiday, and that is to make it "merry," or pleasant for others. It is a lesson that we are slow to learn, and we ask you to take the old man's word for it, and begin young. Celebrate this coming Christmas by making some one, old or young, feel happy. The methods need not be expensive, and parents will be ready to help. Girls will know of some old man or woman to whom a pair of mittens, a comforter, or some little thing they could make, would be very acceptable. Boys can not knit such things, but they can ask their father for a basket of those nice apples to take, on Christmas morning, to some poor people who have no fruit. The value of the gift is of no importance. It is to make such people feel that they are not forgotten. The day will not pass without being a "Merry Christmas," if they feel that some human being thinks of them, and all the better if that being is a child. 4t

Now, having taken this serious view of Christmas, what are we to do for fun? In these holiday times, we make and go to parties, or gatherings of the young folks of the neighborhood. This is the time of all others, for youngsters to come together and be merry, and these children's parties are becoming more and more common each year. It is because it is a useful lesson for boys and girls to meet each other, to get acquainted with, and learn how to entertain one another. At this holiday time many of you will either make or go to such parties. If you give a party to your young friends, be sure to provide for their entertainment. Many older persons think that to entertain a party, they need only to have some refreshments—something to eat. That is well enough in its way, but it is vastly more important to provide some amusements in which all can take part. A gathering of grown persons who are strangers to one another is bad enough, but one of children, until some romping game has "broken the ice," is still worse; so if you have a holiday party, be sure and provide in advance something to amuse the boys and girls. 4t

The transit of Venus, an astronomical event for which the world has been preparing for eight years, occurred Wednesday. The transit was plainly seen by the use of smoked glass, and was beheld by scores of our citizens. A transit of a planet is its passage across the sun's face, and so far as the earth is concerned only two planets, Mercury and Venus, can make a transit. The transits of Mercury are frequent, but, owing to its nearness to the sun, of small scientific value compared with those of Venus. That planet is nearer the earth, and her parallax being more sensible, she is more available as a means of measuring the solar system, for such is the interest which invests her transits.
